Described by a Westinghouse Expert as Extremely Painful.

OVER 1,050 VOLTS IS DANGER. Human Resistance Hard to Measure and Cremation Possible.

A MAN WHO SURVIVED 2,500 VOLTS

NEW YORK, July 12.-Franklin L. Pope, the veteran electrical expert, testified before Referee Becker in the case of Kemmler, the condemned murderer, yesterday, and said he did not believe sufficient knowledge existed as to the effects of electricity on human beings to determine what amount will kill without danger of torturing the victim. He explained that he had had 30 years' experience with electricity, had been an electrical engineer for 18 years and was the second President of the American Society of Electrical Engineers. At present he is employed as an electrical expert by the Westinghous Electric Light Company. He had, he said, at one time made some experiments with a view to ascertaining the difference in susceptibility of various persons to an electric current, and found that some could stand very little, while others took all that a medical battery was capable of generating.

"Do you consider the Wheatstone bridge a reliable instrument for measuring the elec-trical resistance of human bodies?" Mr.

'I do not think it capable of doing so with any degree of accuracy," the witness replied, "because of the construction of human organism. The instrument is ac-curate in measuring metals and inorganic substances, however. So far as I know there is no means known by which the actual electrical resistance of the human body can be determined definitely. If a man were sent to half a dozen electrical engineers to be measured, the results would be widely different, and the same man's resistance varies greatly at different times." DANGER IN DYNAMOS.

The witness said the Westinghouse dynamos were constructed to generate a 1,050-volt current, and to increase their pressure beyond that point would be dangerous, as they might fly to pieces. To generate 1,050 volts 800 evolutions per minute were necessary, and to increase the voltage would neces-sarily increase the number of evolutions proportionately, and consequently to make it "a dynamo capable of generating 3,000 volts," as recommended in Harold P. Brown's pamphlet, would be dangerous, just as it would be dangerous to run the steam pressure in a boiler above the inspection point.

The electro-motive force of a flash of lightning, he said, was infinitely greater than any artificial electricity that could be gencrated. By artificial means it is "not possi-ble to shatter a broomstick, while lightning could shatter the largest tree or knock down Trinity steeple." Where artificial electrical shocks from high tension currents do not prove fatal the skin is generally burned, and sometimes the flesh also. A saturated sponge would not insure against burning, as it was possible to produce an electric arc under water even, and the water in the sponge might in a few seconds be made to boil and scald the culprit. The result might be to carbonize the entire body, but in most cases only the surface of the skin, or at the worst the flesh to the bone would

VERY MUCH IGNORANCE VET. Different people, witness said, receiving shocks from dynamo currents under precisely similar circumstances might fare differently; one might escape uninjured and another be instantly killed. There is absolutely actions the said of th necessary to kill a human being except what was brought out in Mr. Brown's experiments on animals, and very little i known about the conditions under which any of the accidental victims of the current killed by one stroke.

"Its lightning less fatal to human beings than to animals?" Mr. Cockran asked.
"It would seem so," replied Mr. Pope.
"We can tell very little about the effect on human beings by experimenting on animals. Nearly everything depends upon the subject's susceptibility."
"Do you know of any current," asked Mr. Cockran, "that will absolutely cause death in every instance?" On cross-examination Deputy Attorney General Poste and District Attorney Quim-by brought out the well-known fact that the Westinghouse Company objects to the use of its machines for killing people, because of the attempt being made to make it appear dangerous to have the company's current in

"Do you believe death could be produced Mr. Quimby asked.

"I think it is possible, but by no means certain. I never heard of more than two or three persons in all who were accidentally killed by alternating currents."

"Po you believe electrical deaths are pain-

"I believe that as a rule deaths caused by electric currents are extremely painful."

The witness said the highest voltage in any circuit in New York is from 2,000 to 3,-000 continuous current and 1,050 alternating

SURVIVED A 2,500-VOLT SHOCK.

Daniel J. McFall furnishes the following details of his sensations from an electric shock on the Sutro Tunnel level of the Chol-

In May, 1889, I was in the employ of the California Electric Light and Motor Company as dynamo runner in the dynamo chamber on the 1,630 level of the Chollar mine, where the auxiliary power for operating the Nevada Mill by the electric transmission of power is situated. In the dynamo chamber are a number of small incandescent lights, some of which have long wire attrached to the characters. small incandescent lights, some of which have long wire attachments so they can be carried to any part of the room for the convenience of the workmen. Those lights are attached to a 125-horse power dynamo used for transmitting the power to the mill. One of those lights was temporarily hung over a dynamo that was being repaired. The light not being close enough I reached up my right hand and grasped the wire for the purpose of pulling in the slack. At some previous time this wire had been wound around a nail which had broken the insulation, and left a part of the wire bare. I, not being aware of this, unfortunately grabbed the wire at this place. My right-foot boot was a little damp and in turning the toe happened to touch a piece of iron running to the little damp and in turning the toe happened to touch a piece of iron running to the ground. Immediately I was struck, my right hand grasping the light wire and the toe of my right foot-boot touching the iron leading to the ground, "grounded" me (connected me with the ground), and in consequence the current in the electric wires, or at least a good portion of it, passed through my body. Electricity will always run to the ground first if it gets the opportunity, so when I made the connection the current passed through me to the ground. It is very hard to define my feelground. It is very hard to define my feel-ing. First I received a most peculiar sensation that shook my body and me, and yet at the same time I was fully conscious. I tried to let go my hold of the wire, but of course found that impossible, for the harder the shock the more contracted the muscles become, and consequently the firmer the wire is held. I tried to shout for aid, and, although a fellow-workman was but five or six feet distant from me with his lace turned in my direction, I could not emit a sound nor make the least movement to attract his attention. It seemed as if I was being irresistibly drawn up, with a horrible feeling of being consumed by the electric fluid, I fully COMPLETELY PARALYZED realized my position and believed that my time had come. While receiving the shock my eyesight was good until I became unconscious. Of course I was unable to let go my hold of the wire or move my foot from the iron that grounded me until I became unconscious. Then the weight of my body loosened my hold on the wire, and I fell to the ground. I lay like dead, my heart pulsations entirely ceased and also the circulation. The fellow workmen saw me drop. They carried me to the fresh air, stretched me on the damp ground, applied ice water douche to me and worked my arms to promote circulation and artificial respiration. A ter the lapse of 20 minutes, when I was about to be given up for dead, signs of life retureed. At first I was dazed, could not understand what had happened; in a few minutes, though, I remember of new concerns into existence as competitors, and that the result would be disastrous.
